Dear Instacart Design Team,

The part of product design I enjoy most is making complicated, high-stakes systems feel dependable. That is what drew me to the Senior Product Designer II role on the Order Quality team. When an order does not go as expected, the experience has to do more than explain what happened - it has to help the customer recover quickly and rebuild trust.

I have spent the past five-plus years designing complex products across fintech, insurance, AI, and enterprise SaaS. At Vurt, where I currently lead design, I redesigned the platform around a growing ecosystem of users and exchangers. At CyVi, I worked across connected experiences for customers, insurers, brokers, claims teams, and internal administrators. A checkout redesign I led reduced completion time by 70% and increased conversions by 40%.

Those projects taught me how to balance the needs of several user groups without losing sight of the overall experience. I am comfortable moving from early research and problem framing into detailed flows, prototypes, polished UI, and implementation with product and engineering teams. I also use AI tools in my workflow to explore ideas and build prototypes faster, while keeping the final decisions grounded in user needs and product context.

Instacart's Order Quality work is the kind of complex, measurable problem I would genuinely enjoy owning. I would be excited to bring my experience with multi-sided systems, transactional trust, and end-to-end product design to the Fulfillment team.

Best,
Mofifoluwa Olawuyi
